

Gober Gas - Swami Gobers Critical Insights into the Bhagavad Gita

Hastinapura was the glorious capital city of the Kuru Kingdom, a kingdom which altogether from boundary to boundary occupied an area the size of a modern metropolitan city with its suburbia. People proudly used to refer to this small district which even didnt have an independent name as the Hastinapur Empire, or Hastinapur Samrajya. The Mahabharata, as we know, is the epic story of the mammoth dynastic struggle between two sets of brothers, mutual cousins, for the throne of Hastinapura. This family conflict somehow escalated into one of the greatest wars that ever took place in the history of humanity, involving several millions of soldiers and top-notch warriors, and wreaking untold havoc on the entire country, way back in those ancient times. Wherein lay the seeds of this colossal wanton destruction? It all began in much happier times. The vast empire was divided between the Kaurava brothers and Pandava brothers and all of them lived in peace and prosperity for a good while. But in those days there was no television and people simply got bored to death, there was just not enough drama going on in their lives. The tedium of everyday life must have seemed deathly particularly to the people of the ruling elite. There seemed to be no point in living, for it was war that gave meaning and purpose to life. And herein lay the true seeds of destruction: the simple fact that TV wasnt invented yet. Something had to be done, but the whole political and social milieu was more or less at a static equilibrium, and no one had any clue how to proceed. Is the Mahabharata story over before it could even begin properly? That would have spelled disaster; a place like ancient India deprived of its epics is like a modern middle class home deprived of its satellite television. There is an eerie absence of raucous noise, the calm is chillingly funereal. And the Almighty God of the universe would not have it that way.
