Drone warfare will become more sophisticated, deadly, and available. Information on developing weapons of mass destruction will be increasingly accessible. In the coming decade or two, it is prudent to judge that at least four Greater Middle East states—Pakistan, India, Israel, and Iran—are likely to have nuclear weapon capability and/or other weapons of mass destruction, precision weapons, drones, and cyber war know-how, including the possibility of threatening the U.S. power grid. In this context, it may be important to take notice of incremental overt and/or possible covert technological advances. Incremental concerns may include such military-related advances as Irans November 2013 unveiling of its surveillance and combat drone, Fotros, with a range that covers much of the Middle East, including Israel. More ominously, the same technological advancement that will permit Amazons drone delivery of online purchases could also turn a weaponized, miniature drone into a weapon of choice for a 21st-century jackal. Finally, the concerns of the Defense Science Board, a U.S. Department of Defense advisory panel, include the need to track small inventories of nuclear material, covert facilities, the use of non-traditional technologies and new nuclear players, according to the Wall Street Journal. In the Journal article, the Defense Science Board is reported as judging that For the first time since the early decades of the nuclear era the United States needs to be just as concerned about new nuclear nations and transnational groups as it is about existing nuclear weapon countries. To this end, the Defense Science Board advocates analyzing vast amounts of data to unearth anomalous events that could signal threats such as a covert nuclear operation.
